SELECTING FRUIT AND NUT PRODUCING PLANTS FOR YOUR LANDSCAPE
U of M Extension Service

There are many benefits to planting trees and shrubs in your landscape. Trees take in carbon dioxide and expel oxygen in a harmonious relationship with breathing animals and humans. "One acre of forest absorbs 6 tons of carbon dioxide and produces 4 tons of oxygen. Enough to meet the annual needs of 18 people." (USDA) Trees improve soil and water quality, and energy conservation by providing summer shade and winter wind protection, wildlife habitat, sources for food, and increased aesthetic and economic value to home properties. There are trees and shrubs in Minnesota that produce edible fruits and nuts that people can harvest and use from the wild and in their backyard.

Many Minnesotans hike forests and woodlands for wild edible fruits and nuts. An excellent wild gatherers resource is the Minnesota Harvester Handbook which addresses sustainable natural resource harvest practices and uses. This resource was developed by the University of Minnesota Extension with many contributors. It demonstrates the breadth and diversity of natural resources found in and around the state's woodlands. Copies can be purchased at the Minnesota Bookstore: http://z.umn.edu/mhh.

Homeowners who would like to plant trees and/or shrubs that produce edible fruits and nuts from their backyard have many plant options to choose from. The University of Minnesota Extension has an excellent web site that reviews many possible plants that can produce delicious nutritious foods. Categories on this web site include: apples, pears, cherries, plums, peaches, apricots, grapes, blueberries, raspberries, strawberries, melons and other fruits. Under the "Other Fruits" section click on "Gathering and Growing Edible Fruits and Nuts". This publication lists many fruit and nut plants that can be grown in home landscapes. http://z.umn.edu/umfruit.

Resources to select landscape trees include:

Recommended trees for specific regions of Minnesota: http://z.umn.edu/rectrees.

UM Arboretum publication "The Value of Trees": www.arboretum.umn.edu/valueoftrees.aspx.

Mn/DOT Plant Selection program: http://www.dot.state.mn.us/roadsides/plantselector/.

North Dakota Tree Book: www.ag.ndsu.edu/trees/handbook.htm.

Crabapples – Select Apple Scab resistant varieties. http://z.umn.edu/asrcrabapples.

People who have disease or insect problems this summer can look at the UM Extension diagnostic web site: http://z.umn.edu/diagnose.

Plant several different species of trees, shrubs and plants in the landscape for landscape diversity. No one species should represent more than 15 percent of the landscape.

EDUCATION AND PREVENTION HELP BOOST HORSE WELFARE IN MINNESOTA
U of M Extension Service

There are fewer neglected horses in Minnesota, a trend experts attribute to an improved economy, education and other preventive measures.

From 2008 to 2013, the state's Animal Humane Society was called in to investigate conditions of an average of 1,400 horses per year, a 400 percent increase over previous years. While the numbers of horses owned in Minnesota has remained about the same, the number of animal welfare investigations in 2014 and 2015 dropped to a yearly average of 894.

"There have been concerted efforts to respond on many fronts and we're seeing the numbers decrease. Minnesota's equine community is working hard to keep that trend going," says Krishona Martinson, University of Minnesota Extension equine specialist. In addition to the recovering economy, Martinson cited several factors contributing to the improved status of Minnesota horses:

- Greater public education through Extension: In addition to educational events, online materials have been widely shared and social media campaigns continue raising awareness.
- Emergency help: The Minnesota Hay Bank has raised more than $76,000 and fed more than 600 at-risk horses.
- Population control: 122 stallions were castrated at free clinics hosted by the Minnesota Horse Welfare Coalition, which also gave University veterinary students valuable experience with the procedure.
- Feeder studies: Extension research found that when a feeder isn't used, up to 57 percent of hay is wasted, a finding that's prompted greater innovation in feeder design and feeder use by owners.

Extension was awarded a $77,000 grant from the Morris Animal Foundation in 2011 to study horse neglect and develop prevention plans. In addition to its education and outreach, Extension hosted a major horse welfare summit in 2014.

When horses are mistreated, emaciated or ill, the costs for their veterinary care, lodging and other needs can run as high as $20,000 per horse. These costs are typically absorbed by the nonprofit sector.

Martinson cautioned that to avoid backsliding, a solid understanding about what horse ownership entails is essential. Basic nutrition and health costs for a healthy adult horse costs a minimum of $2,000 a year.

"Horses can easily live 25 or 30 years—and they usually get more expensive as they age," she says. "It's tempting to buy a horse, especially at a low cost or when it's presented as an opportunity to rescue the animal. But like any other investment, horse ownership requires calculating the true cost and length of commitment."

Her sentiments were echoed by Nancy Turner, president of This Old Horse, a nonprofit sanctuary for horses in Dakota County, and an advocate for responsible horse ownership.

"Education and outreach have made a big difference for many horses in Minnesota," she says. "We need to keep that awareness high."

The Extension horse program's online resources (http://www.extension.umn.edu/agriculture/horse) features factsheets, webinars, podcasts and a monthly newsletter for horse owners and those considering ownership. It also features mobile phone apps that calculate cost of hay and estimate horse bodyweight.
